His footprint at the IJR grew to include research and policy work on race relations and transitional justice in post-conflict societies. He has travelled and worked in the above programmes in countries like South Sudan, the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Zimbabwe. Kenneth also led the South African leg of an international peacebuilding research programme run by the IJR and the Universities of Manchester [UK] and George Mason [USA]. The project included Zimbabwe, Uganda, Colombia, the USA and the UK and featured policy makers from various departments and tiers of the South African government.

He has served on the Steering Committee of South Africa's National Action Plan to combat Racism, Xenophobia and Related Intolerances [an outcome of the Durban Declaration of the United Nations World Conference Against Racism and Related Intolerances]. He continues to contribute to this as well as civil society programmes that contribute to social cohesion.
